Proper Carefulness of a Rich Man. How Mr Peabody looked after his pence -It is said that the late Mr Peabody, with all his prodigality on works of benevolence, looked closely after his pence. He hated nothing more than the notion of being taken in, and it was rare indeed that any trickster could make that boast. On one occasion when traveling in Ireland he was greatly annoyed at what seemed a very extortionate demand on the part of a car driver, and he accordingly resented the attempt at imposition by giving the man his bare legal fare. Mr Jefferson himself in writing on the 6th of March, 1801, to John Dickenson, and speaking of his election and the administration party, says: "The storm through which we have passed has been tremendous indeed. In a letter written to James Monroe previous to his election, dated February 16th, he says: "Four days of balloting have produced not a single change of a vote. Yet it is confidently believed that to-morrow there is to be a coalition. I know of no foundation for this belief. If they (referring to the Administration party) could have been permitted to pass a law for putting the Government into the hands of an officer, they would certainly have prevented an election. But we thought it best to declare openly and firmly, one and all, that the day such an act passed the Middle States would arm, and that no such usurpation even for a single day should be submit-

Again in a letter written on March 9, 1801, to Gov. McKean, Mr Jefferson says: "Had it (the election) terminated in the elevation of Mr Burr, every Republican would, I am sure, have acquiesced in a moment, because however it might have been varient from the intentions of the voters, yet it would have been agreeable to the Constitution. No man would have more cheerfully submitted than myself. * * But in the event of a usurpation, I was decidedly with those who were determined not to permit it; because, that precedent once set, would be artificially reproduced and end soon in a dictator."

Such was the language and determination of Mr Jefferson and his followers threequarters of a century ago, in a crisis not so great as that now upon the people of this country; then the cloud was as a man's hand, now it spreads well over the political lie in wait, like leashed hounds, the light-"Gentlemen, I happened to be there, and nings of personal and party ambition and avarice, ready to leap forth at the beckon of a single hand and strike down the very of seventy-five years made usurpation less hateful to the hearts, or the dictator more comely to the eyes of the American people?
